Researchers and conservationists are calling on the youth of their generation to develop a collective voice to drive the global shift in land use that will be needed to ensure we can feed a rapidly expanding population and address climate change. Writing in this week's Lancet, authors led by Prof Paul Ehrlich and including Prof Dr Bill Laurance, director of WWF-US's Centre for Tropical Forest Science, say that "sustainability is not a distant concern but a prerequisite for the continued well-being of our species and the planet on which we live." In a recently published paper, the group calls for the development of a citizens' movement to tackle these issues. The authors believe a combination of individual and collective action will be needed to ensure that the planetary boundaries are not breached. Among the barriers to action, they cite lack of public participation in natural resource management, poor public understanding of the science and controversies around impact assessments. "This is a global challenge; it is a tipping point for the future of life on Earth. At the heart of the challenge is the urgent need to build a new, just, sustainable world," they write. "The problem is not that we do not have the scientific knowledge and technological capacity to save the planet, but that we are not prepared to do what it takes." However, they outline a broad range of actions that could address this. These include actions to solve the "climate change trilemma"; promoting ethical consumption patterns to address our excessive demand for non-renewable materials; and conserving biodiversity to ensure there is sufficient biologically available land and water. They also suggest that "the need to produce food is a reason for conservation because of the substantial and avoidable loss of land due to conversion to other uses". They say the motivation for action stems from the awareness that the outcome of the choices we make today will affect not just our own generation but future generations, who have been "unusually vulnerable to extreme weather events and the loss of biodiversity". "In the long term, we must act collectively to overcome the many barriers to collective action in tackling sustainability. Natural regeneration may be able to provide the basis for this," they write. "Projects such as the Great Upheaval, which was a natural experiment, provide a glimpse of this potential, with rare intact forest communities and species re
